July 17.-- There was very little wind, and we continued off the island. In the afternoon a small boat, containing a couple of men, was rowed towards us. We found they were Greeks who had escaped from Chismeh, having been threatened to be murdered by the Turks. They had fled into the woods, where they lived in concealment a week, when they managed to obtain a boat, in which they meant to have rowed to the first Greek island they could reach, had they not fallen in with us. They were immediately taken on board, and their boat hoisted up. Their provision had been only some very hard brown bread and a bottle of water, and their means of defence a cutlass which one of them possessed. They had originally made their escape from the island of Scio. When the Turks took this island, the horrible...
