Excerpt: .He took him by the arm and led him away. Little by little he drew from him so much of the story of his sorrows as Lazarus could tell without betraying his real relationship to Mary--a secret which he would jealously guard with his latest breath. The confidence thus forced from him, and kindly received by the other, seemed to have brought some relief to his mind. When at last they parted at the corner of the street, the stranger gave him a card, bearing his name and address, and, moreover, promised to make immediate inquiries. If it proved as Lazarus had said, he would endeavour to procure him fresh employment. And at least, so far as the inquiry was concerned, the stranger seemed resolved to keep his word. While Abraham retraced his steps to his home, with a still and grateful heart, for the first time these many weeks cherishing again real hopes of deliverance, his new friend made his way to the City. Would the account of the Jew prove correct? It did not sound a likely story. He had so often been deceived. Should he try again? He shook his head doubtfully. One thing, at any rate, was true. Here was the shop. He paused irresolute before entering it. Would they laugh at the story he was about to tell? But again that haggard face rose before his mind, and he rapidly passed into the shop. There were not any customers...
