Excerpt: .In London, which is only one of the English Trade centres, shops are confined to no particular locality, Vol. v. 14 although a good many of the smaller masters are to be found in Crispin Street, Spitalfields, and in and about Tabard Street in Southwark, which is also the home of the brush-makers. Basket-work, by which is to be understood the manufacture of anything with wicker that is not fastened with nails, has no distinct branches for specially skilled men. In practice, the less skilled are kept on what is known as slewed white or brown work, i.e. the making of hampers, round market sieves, and fish baskets from unpeeled osier rods; whereas more highly skilled men earn better money on general work with peeled rods, which includes all fancy work in the making of chairs, wine flats, clothes baskets and luncheon hampers, as well as laundry and dress baskets, grocers bottle baskets, basinettes, c, c. Process of Work.--Basket-makers, known to their familiar friends as twiggies, when at work usually sit on a stout wide plank placed on the floor, and slightly inclined upwards at one end. They start on the bottoms of the baskets, and when making round goods begin by standing over their work, using both hands and feet to keep the bottoms flat. As soon as these are ready they are staked up, i.e. the upright stakes on which the sides are woven are fixed in position. This done, the man...
